horse stealing in the criminal superior court, pleaded guilty on Wednesday morning and turned state's evidence. He told the entire story of the affair as far as he knew, and stated that he was drawn into it by Epstein.

The horses, it will be remembered, were stolen at Warwick, R. I., from Robert Forsythe, and were driven through this city, Chief Murphy finally locating them on the Weiner place in Chesterfield and gave this information to the Rhode Island authorities, who, with the assistance of Policeman Henderson, went to the Weiner place and made the arrests, securing one horse and the harness; one of the pair of horses had died.

When court came in on Wednesday morning Needless was put to plea again and said that he was guilty of assisting in the stealing of two horses from Warwick, R. L. on June 2. He was called as the first wilness in the case against H. E. Epstein and Leon Weiner, both being tried together. He stated that he lives in Providence, where he has a family. About June I he was in New York looking for work and met Epstein, having known him for a period of six months. He was offered a job if he would go to Providence, and they went, Epstein staying at the home of Needles. Epstein returned one day with the story that he knew of a man in trouble over a mortgage on his farm and Epstein introduced Needles to him. They boarded a car and rode for an hour and half, when Needles was told to walt for their return, which he did. They came back with two horses at night and he was hired to drive one to New London, but instead of going there they came back with two horses at night and he was hired to drive one to New London, but instead of going there they came back with two horses at night and he was hired to drive one to New London, but instead of going there they came back with two horses at night and he was hired to drive one to New London, but instead of going there they came the seal and the seal hired to drive one to New London, but instead of going there they came back with two horses at night and he They came back with two horses at night and he was hired to drive one to New London, but instead of going there they came through Norwich and went to Weiner's place in Montville. ACADEMY BUILDING FUND

REACHES TOTAL OF $1,400 Contribution of $100 by William C. Osgood to Help Along the Good Cause.

On Wednesday The Bulletin received another contribution of $100 to its Academy building fund, to assist in paying off the indebtedness on the new building, which amounts to $48,000.
This last donation was from William Osgood, and serves to help along the good cause.

Every contribution helps along this magnificent work. Being an object in which everyone must be interested more or less, it would seem as though every citizen of Norwich, every gradnate and their friends would want to have a part in the raising of this fund, which will insure the corporation against crippling its great educational work, by keeping it from making any inroads into the invested funds, the income of which is all needed in providing educations for the youth of this end of the state.
